

Nate Henn (pictured at right) of the charity group Invisible Children, which helps war orphans in Uganda, was killed on July 11 in a terrorist bombing in Kampala, Uganda. Henn visited Duxbury last year with Invisible Children.

Activist who visited Duxbury killed

By JUSTIN GRAEBER, CLIPPER EDITOR
JUSTIN@DUXBURYCLIPPER.COM

The leader of the Invisible Children team Nate Henn, who came to Duxbury this spring was the American that was killed July 11 in the terrorist bombing in Kampala, Uganda during a World Cup viewing party.

Henn and a young man from Uganda, Innocent, came to the Performing Arts Center in March to speak about the plight of orphans and child soldiers in that country.

"Nate worked with us at Invisible Children for a year and a half and leaves behind a legacy of honor, integrity, and service," reads a post on the Invisible Children's Web site. "From traveling the United States without pay advocating for the freedom of abducted child soldiers in Joseph Kony's war, to raising thousands of dollars to put war-affected Ugandan students in school, Nate lived a life that demanded explanation. He sacrificed his comfort to live in the humble service of God and of a better world, and his is a life to be emulated."

Henn was given the Acholi name "Oteka," which means "the strong one," by the kids he worked with.

Henn stayed with several Duxbury families during his visit to town and made many friends, according to Duxbury High School teacher and African Service Project advisor Susan Sullivan.

"He was an amazing young man and I am so sad that this great humanitarian trying to make the world a better place is gone," Sullivan said in an e-mail.

"Invisible Children is dedicated to rebuilding the country," Henn told the audience after showing his film in March. "We believe we can do that through education."

You can read more about Invisible Children and Nate, or donate to their efforts, at invisiblechildren.com.